

American Economic Review Disclosure Statement

Announcements of Support and Public Good Provision

The author declares that he has no relevant or material financial interests that relate to the research described in this paper.

The author's brother is the founder and CEO of a technology start-up called DipJar, in which the author has a small financial stake. The company provides services in the charitable giving sector (it manufactures a hardware device for receiving tips and donations in both for-profit and non-profit settings), but the company is otherwise unrelated to the research in the paper.

Funding for the study came from Harvard Business School and the Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania.

No other party had the right to review the paper prior to circulation.

IRB approval was granted for the experiments in the paper.

The charity the author worked with to conduct the field experiment granted access to data and allowed this research to be conducted but was only willing to do so under a contract that requires the author to preserve the anonymity of the charity and to keep confidential the data to which the author was granted access. Since the author conducted the laboratory experiments himself, survey software, data from the laboratory experiments, and replication code are being made available as per the Data Availability Policy.

Judd B. Kessler